Combating discrimination lies at the heart of human rights protection. Preventing discrimination from occurring is central therefore to the guarantee of an effective human rights framework. Key to preventing discrimination is the obligation to carry out equality duties.

This practically-minded seminar will explore how equality duties work and how they can be enforced. The leading equality and human rights experts in the country will explain the legal framework governing equality duties and what this should mean in practice. The seminar will focus on how the enforcement of equality duties changes the nature of discrimination law and the remedies that can be available for failure to carry out equality duties obligations. The seminar will identify how equality duties can be litigated, as well as its modern policy context.

The event is free to members and corporate members of the HRLA, for non-members the fee is £5.00.
